TRANSPLANTING HINTS
There will be little difficulty in transplanting if one realizes that the important thing is to keep roots from being exposed to the air. Because this will weaken, if not kill the plant, professional nurserymen are careful to wrap all roots in moss fibre, or keep some of the original soil around them, and they also keep them moist.

In every garden there is a lot of transplanting work to do. Tomatoes, cabbage, petunias, marigolds, and annual flower and vegetable plants will have to be taken from greenhouses and set out in the garden.
There will be nursery stock, like fruit and ornamental trees, rose bushes, shrubs etc., to be moved or bought and planted. Often too, in thinning certain flowers or vegetables planted from seed in the open, it is possible to salvage the plants taken out.

If there is any secret about this business of transplanting it is to protect the roots from air and sun keep them moist before, during and after the transplanting and make sure seed soil is pressed down firmly. Moistening before removal will allow a bit of earth to come with the roots and will prevent damage to the tiny hair-like feeding roots, which are essential if the plant is to
